Richard Saunders (The Great Impostor) is not above forging documents. Saunders has a complete set of documents for his fictional character, Lawrence Howard and these documents will appear in the novel as the story unfolds. But there is another side to this story. Other documents that are not forgeries are offered as proof to substantiate the incredible "story behind the story". A few samples are included in the following pages.

Richard Saunders invented the technique of “method-writing”. Saunders first envisions an episode or event that could fit into his novel. He then attempts to act-out that vision in real life in an effort to “make it happen”.

Finally he fictionalizes the event and folds it into the novel. Sometimes these “method-written” episodes played out as imagined and sometimes they morphed into something else.

Oftentimes Saunders will engage with famous (or soon to be famous) individuals who have no idea that they have been sucked into this fantasy-fiction world.

Most of this book was written or outlined in real-time as these events occurred over the past fifty years. We believe that what Saunders has accomplished here is revolutionary and unlike anything ever previously undertaken or written.

Richard Saunders (The Great Impostor) is not above forging documents or telling tall tales; so take our advice and attempt to independently verify any of the claims and / or documents on the following pages. Saunders claims that everything here is legit and can be proved. In areas where questions still exist, the geocache contents, once found, will remove all doubts.

Mykl Walsh and Richard Saunders have buried a geocache on public land in southern New Hampshire. The location of this treasure is hidden in code within the pages of Journey, A Short Story – Volume I. The following items are samples of the type of things that will be found in this underground vault. They connect the real-life “method-written” events with the fiction that they inspired – or vice-versa.

Mr. Saunders accidental recording of his 1998 meeting with Dan Brown is just one of the items waiting to be found.

Hard-luck skater finally strikes gold

By Ron Lesko

HAMAR, Norway (AP) — Dan Jansen, skating in the last race of his hard-luck Olympic career, set a world record in the 1,000 meters today, narrowly avoiding yet another disaster when he swaddled himself in a storm.

Mr. Jansen, of Greenfield, Wis., crossed the finish line in 1 minute, 12.33 seconds, 11 factors from the track's Canadian, Kevin Scott, set in December.

"I don't know what to say," a bearded Mr. Jansen said moments after the race as his wife, Robin,

Offer of proof that Rich Saunders and Dan Brown met in 1998

Brown has authenticated his inscription here, but claims to not remember the content of the conversation from that meeting. Saunders is skeptical, but will give Mr. Brown the benefit of the doubt.

What is certainly not in doubt is that Dan Brown altered his genre after this meeting and appears to have taken Saunders' advice. Brown's newly adopted genre resembles Saunders' and Saunders' work in the genre came first.

Saunders decided to not fictionalize this episode in the novel. He thought that doing so might appear to trivialize this sensitive story. After much anguish, Saunders decided to include the story in his book because the Memorial struggles to raise funding for its perpetual care. He hopes that giving it visibility in his book might help with those fundraising efforts.
